THE STORY OF THE ELECTRIC LAMP

How Thomas A. Edison Made Electric Lighting Possible Thirty-Five Years Ago

Thirty-five years ago on the twenty first of October, Thomas A. Edison pro duced the first successful incandescent lamp. To fully appreciate the import ance of this wonderful invention one must go back to those days when household electric lighting was deemed Zeitung's statement that Great Britain impossible by the world's greatest scienwas unable to raise more than 600,000 tists, when the only illuminants were candles, oil lamps and now and then a gas plant in the larger cities. Street exactly double that number, namely lighting was not seriously attempted, store and shops were not illuminated after closing hours and only a few smal! oil lamps and flickering candles served to illuminate the household after dark.

Those were strenuous days for Mr.

Edison. Beside the enormous amount of work entailed by the operations of his manufacturing shops, he was elaborating the engineering plans for the first central station in New York City, covering carefully every detail; he was turning out several new inventions every day; and helping the Board of Fire Underwriters formulate rules fo the new art of incandescent lighting. stands to reason that an empire of 400,- He was also working on the innumer 000,000 can never lack men. This war able details relating to isolated electric for us has hardly begun. It was a mateer of years before the mental knowledge of the art of incanlescent lighting. This ignorance gave rise to a long list of most ludicrous incidents. The lamp works shipped some lamps to a customer, forwarding therewith the usual memorandum of shipment, which in this case read: "100 lamps, 110 volts." The customer returned the memorandum with this note written at the foot: "Lamps received

Developments in the new art of in candescent lighting came thick and fast from Mr. Edison in the early eighties. Improvement followed improvement with dazzling rapidity. The manufacturing shops were buzzing hives of industry. Real money, how ever, was a scarce commodity. Mr Edison had been obliged to finance the organization of the shops himself, and when the Ashland Steel Company shut in doing so had to a large extent morgaged his future. There was some fearful and wonderful financing done when the pay rolls of the four shops were made up at the week ends.

Late one summer afternoon in 1881 Mr. Edison was sitting in Major Eaton's office talking with him. The door opened and in came Mr. F. R Upton, the manager of the lamp factory, which was then a small wooden building at Menlo Park, Mr. Uptor was the one who, about a year previous to this time, had gone from Menle Park to New York having on his arm market basket containing all the incandescent lamps in the world.

"Hello! Upton," said Mr. Edison, 'How are you making out?", "Fine," eplied Mr. Upton exultantly. "We finshed a thousand lamps today."

Mr. Edison said nothing but seized pad of paper and figured for a few ninutes. Then looking up, he said, "In fifteen years you'll be making forty housand a day,"

As a matter of fact, the lamp facory was actually turning out about 45,000 lamps a day in 1896, and this number per hour is not unusual today.
